Summary of Activities and Future Plans

My academic field is discourse analysis – the study of language use in context. Drawing on a range of analytic and theoretical approaches to language and discourse – pragmatics, micro-interactionism, conversation analysis, linguistic anthropology and ethnography of communication – I employ rigorous detailed analysis of linguistic and discursive phenomena as a way of exploring the social functions and meanings of real-life texts and interactions, and their complex interrelations with their cultural and institutional contexts.

The core strand of my work, since the beginning of my career to this day, focuses on the discourse analysis of television talk – that is, on examining the inner logic, communicative ethos and generic characteristics of broadcast interactions. I strive to fruitfully combine the discourse analytic micro-level sensitivity to the minute details of talk with a macro-level orientation to the public and social roles and ramifications of popular television texts, as discussed in media and television studies.

Over the years, I've applied this approach to the study of the most salient and dominant genres on Israeli commercial television in the periods studied: talk shows in the 1990's and early 2000's, reality television in the 2000's, and lastly television news, whose centrality remains constant throughout the years. While focusing on these three genres in my independent work, in my collaborative works I've extended to the study of additional genres, including various types of mediated political discourse.

Lately, my interest in media discourse has evolved in two directions. The first is a focus on meta-discourse as a specific fertile site for exploring the normative frameworks and beliefs of social actors. Several of my most recent publications examine various forms of meta-discourse, and I plan to further develop and extend this line of work in the near future. The second direction emerges from my teaching experience in recent years, which has turned my attention to mediated talk as realized not on television but rather in the digital sphere. In the future, I hope to examine the relevance and adaptation of my analytic approach to the study of computer-mediated interactions in general, and to the cross-platform relationships between traditional and social media in particular.

In parallel to my specific interest in media and television discourse, I also have a more general commitment to developing, consolidating and disseminating discourse analysis as a productive methodology for qualitative research in the social sciences, as evident in my research, teaching and academic service. Over the years I've taken part in collaborative studies in various research fields and on various research objects, such as children's discursive skills and their naturally occurring peer interactions, the historical evolution of political manifestos, or the participation frameworks of museumgoers comments. Similarly, my teaching exhibits a growing focus on methodology in general and on a methodological outlook on discourse analysis in particular. Finally, in recent years, by working with The Israeli Center for Qualitative Research of People and Societies at Ben-Gurion University of the Negev and by offering several workshops to researchers and graduate students from a range of disciplines and institutions, I've dedicated much of my academic service to promoting the accessibility and utility of discourse analysis to social scientists. I hope to continue pursuing this goal in the future.
